New Administrative Arrangements for Several Service Units

New Structure for Academic Link Activities

The University reaffirms the policy of continuing to expand academic links with major centres of excellence worldwide. To facilitate such an expansion the following new arrangements have been made:

A Committee on Academic Links (for membership please refer to P.7) was set up in June 1991 to replace the Senate Committee on International Programmes. The new committee reports to the Administrative and Planning Committee and is chaired by Prof. Ambrose King, the pro-vice-chancellor, who will provide guidance and supervision for the development of the University's academic link activities.

A new Office of Academic Links will also be established from 1st September 1991, with staff redeployed from the University Secretariat and the Office of International Studies Programme, to provide better coordinated and cost-effective administrative support services to various departments involved in the development of academic link activities. A director will be recruited to head the office and he will report administratively to Prof. Ambrose King.

The Universities Service Centre – a World Famous China Research Centre

from 1st July 1991, a permanent part of the University

What Kind of ‘Service’ Does It Render?

Near the side door of the University Library hangs an inconspicuous bronze plaque, bearing the inscription, ‘Universities Service Centre’; an unlikely sounding name for what is actually a world famous research centre. For nearly a quarter of a century this research centre has been an oasis for those carrying out research into modern China. By the early eighties, over 200 books had been published following research at the centre, many of which have since become required reading for other researchers in the field.

A Landmark in the History of China Research

Established in Hong Kong in 1963, the centre symbolized the dawning of a new age in China research. This had been at a low ebb since the deterioration of China-US relations following the Korean War and the ‘McCarthyite persecution’. American scholars conducting research into Chinese affairs at that time risked being suspected of having communist leanings and might become subject to investigation by the FBI. However, by the end of the fifties, a group of China scholars possessing the vision and foresight to recognize the future importance of such a great country decided to set up a Chinese research centre and launch a new phase in China research. Since it was impossible at that time to enter China for research purposes, the next best choice of location for the research centre was Hong Kong. Eventually, through the persistence of the group of scholars, support was obtained from various foundations to establish the Universities Service Centre in Argyle Street, Kowloon.

Many famous scholars in the field of China research have made use of the facilities of the centre, including Lucian Pye, Michael Oksenberg, Ezra Vogal, as well as younger researchers such as Andrew Nathan, Martin Whyte, Suzanne Pepper and Andrew Walder. In the early days of the centre, researchers spent many a long hot summer in the two-storey building on Argyle Street, using materials from the centre and interviewing immigrants from China. The centre attracted China scholars from all over the world throughout the seventies, and it soon became a valuable meeting place. Strong bonds were formed amongst this close-knit community of China scholars, many of which have been maintained up to the present day.

A great many important scholarly works were published during the seventies and early eighties which gave the world a clearer picture of China. The contribution of the Universities Service Centre in this respect cannot be underestimated. It provided the base from which valuable in-depth research on China was carried out, and where Chinese immigrants bearing news were eagerly interviewed and their stories analysed.

Apart from the academic significance of its work, the centre has also contributed to a deeper understanding of China, and this in turn has helped many countries to determine their China policies. Many of the centre’s past scholars have gone on to work for their respective governments – some to become advisers on Chinese affairs, others to become diplomats. Stephen Fitzgerald, for example, became the first ambassador of Australia to Beijing, while Sir David Wilson became Governor of Hong Kong. Both are former researchers at the Universities Service Centre.
Changing Role as a Library of Publications on China

Towards the end of the seventies, China opened its doors to the outside world and China scholars throughout the world were able to fulfill their dreams and observe China at first hand. Not surprisingly, demand for the research facilities at the centre slackened, but John Dolfin, the director at that time, began with considerable foresight to promote another of the centre’s strong points: collecting materials. Despite the limited budget of the centre, and relying mainly on the tenacity and energy of the staff, he built it up into one of the world’s most comprehensive collections of publications on China.

Foreign scholars in China usually find that they must adapt patiently to the varying degrees of bureaucracy with which they are often faced when trying to gather materials for their research. Many of them return home via Hong Kong and call in at the famous centre. They are usually pleasantly surprised at the completeness and accessibility of the collection, having searched far and wide for just such a library.

The centre possibly possesses the most complete and comprehensive collection of post-1949 Chinese material in the world, including entire runs of many national and local Chinese newspapers. For example, it has the People’s Daily from its first edition on 15th May 1946 up to the present, and also other provincial newspapers which were first published in the early fifties. Of the 300 Chinese newspapers currently subscribed to by the centre, 28 are from Guangdong Province, 27 from Shanghai, and 10 from Sichuan Province. These are all invaluable primary sources of information for those engaged in regional research. The centre also subscribes to some 1,200 periodicals, amongst which can be found the usual social science and humanities journals, and also a rare collection of local Chinese periodicals that may well not be available in other libraries outside China. There is also a valuable collection of provincial yearbooks and other statistical data dating from the mid-eighties. Recently published county annals are also being collected now, along with international publications on China. Translations of Chinese periodicals and broadcasts edited in England or America, English translations of daily newspapers, and research works in Chinese or English can also be studied at the centre. There are over 5,000 volumes in the English section of the library, and more than 20,000 volumes in the Chinese section.
The Centre Changed Hands

In a city like Hong Kong where rents are rising every day, it has not been easy to maintain a non-profit-making academic organization. Each year the International Advisory Committee of the centre, and the American Council of Learned Societies, which had been responsible for the management of the centre since the early seventies, had the headache of fund raising and managing the budget. Although for many years organizations such as the Carnegie Foundation, the Ford Foundation, the Mellon Foundation, the Luce Foundation and the National Endowment for the Humanities generously supported the centre when it was the focal point for China research in Far East, as the situation changed it became more difficult to justify asking for support. In 1988, therefore, the American Council of Learned Societies decided to transfer the centre to another American or Hong Kong academic organization for management and support.

Most Western scholars felt that the Universities Service Centre should remain in Hong Kong, since Hong Kong was still an important place for research into Chinese affairs. Hong Kong scholars also felt that having such a rich library of materials available on their doorstep would encourage and stimulate local Hong Kong researchers themselves.

One of the educational goals of The Chinese University is to promote cultural exchange between China and the West. The University has always taken a great interest in China research, and this led to the idea that perhaps it would be in the best interests of both the University and Hong Kong if it were to take over the management of the Universities Service Centre. Negotiations went ahead and the centre moved to The Chinese University campus in the middle of 1988. After a year's frantic preparation the centre reopened in June 1989, just in time to welcome the stream of foreign scholars who had to leave China following the Tiananmen Incident.

Last February, the centre's International Advisory Committee held its third annual meeting since the transfer of the management rights of the centre to The Chinese University. Everyone present at the meeting expressed great satisfaction with the development of the centre and unanimously agreed to the transfer of ownership of the centre to The Chinese University, thus ensuring that the centre would now remain in Hong Kong forever.

A New Lease of Life in CUHK

Located as it is within the academic setting of The Chinese University, the centre can obviously be put to fuller use. No entry fees or special application forms are required of foreign scholars wishing to use the centre — all that is asked is that they should be willing to give a talk at one of the centre's regular lunchtime seminars. These seminars, held twice a month, attract many people interested in China and usually give rise to much useful discussion. Researchers are also asked to acknowledge the services provided by the centre, should any of their work be published after research there. The centre can also help with application for visas, accommodation arrangements and other problems arising. Last year the centre received a subsidy from the American Council of the Learned Societies to invite famous scholars to lecture there. Most of these guest speakers are accomplished professors who have studied at the centre in the past. They often recall with nostalgia their early days at the centre, where many of them first discovered their ideals.

Beginning from last year, undergraduate students of The Chinese University have been granted limited access to the collection. Eventually the centre may be open to postgraduates and even students from other colleges and universities. Because of the amount of support that the centre has received from other departments at the University, especially the library, its management has improved and its finances have been guaranteed.

For a Hong Kong that is destined to return to Chinese sovereignty soon, the maintenance of a superlative collection of resources on China is vital. As that time approaches we are fortunate to have an already well-established Chinese research centre in the form of the Universities Service Centre.
